

Food for Thought | In the News

Holiness encourages us as Christian leaders to 'walk the talk' and be a transforming influence in all aspects of our lives. Captain Laura Van Schaick is an Officer in The Salvation Army in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan. Van Schaick explains that as a leader she aims to radiate the love of Jesus through words and actions on a daily basis in all she does.

Valuing holiness in leadership means leading others towards holiness. While we may offer practical support, the greatest hope we can offer our community is the good news of salvation through Jesus. Van Schaick explains that by sharing with those we are trying to help, then even those who might believe they are beyond help can be transformed by the Holy Spirit.

Our challenge as leaders who value holiness is to bring individuals who cannot see beyond their current reality to a place of understanding their worth in Jesus. Everyone is made in the image of God and can be transformed more and more into His likeness.

Faith and Life - Holiness

Valuing holiness in our everyday lives is not something we do every now and again. Being holy requires leading and living like Jesus in all aspects of our lives.

How to be a spiritual leader in a secular world

Leaders can feel torn between their spiritual life and their work life. It becomes exhausting to keep them separate when they shouldn't be. After all, 'spiritual leadership in a secular world is really just leadership'.

Making an impact in the workplace

Being an authentic leader means allowing your actions and decisions to be guided by your relationship with God in any and every context.

What if holiness, not happiness, is God's plan for your business?

Leadership is not easy and sometimes we feel like we have failed. However our idea of success is not always the same as God's. "His goal for our success is not our happiness, it is more likely our holiness".

From our shelves ...

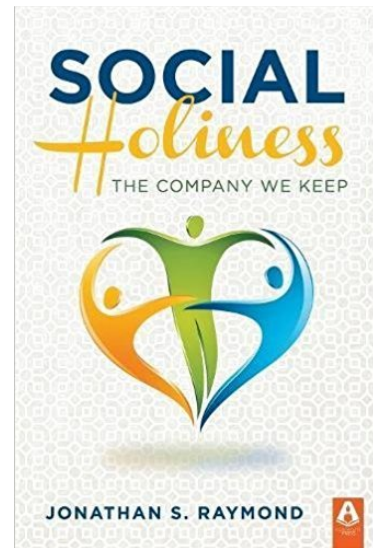

Holiness is not meant to be an individual journey rather it should also be about others. Raymond's book Social

Holiness explores why practicing holiness requires walking with others in all contexts of our lives.
